

Prostate drug may slow down Parkinson's disease

Chinese scientists have discovered that a medication called terazosin, approved for the treatment of benign prostatic hyperplasia, may slow down the progression of Parkinson's disease.