

First peanut allergy drug might be approved soon

The U.S. Food and Drug Administration panel is recommending the approval of the first drug to treat life-threatening peanut allergies, which affect about 1.6 million American children. The drug, Palforzia, still needs final approval from the FDA, but is already offering hope to many patients.