

Private sector opposes contribution amount in universal healthcare system

Private businesses have objected to paying 0.25% of their annual revenues to the universal healthcare system, claiming that the recently passed health insurance law is unconstitutional. The head of the industry federation's tax committee said the current legislation obliges companies to pay the contribution even if they did not make any profits, calling on the government to deduct the contribution from companies' income taxes.